

double-click accelerator, as described in the discussion of the Link Inspector panel in Chapter 5, “P

Some modifier keys should be used only in limited circumstances:

- The Help key should be used only for Help-clicking, which brings up help on the clicked object.
- The combination of Alternate and Control should be used only as a substitute for the Help key. (This is because some keyboards don't have a Help key.)

Applications should avoid distinguishing between the left and right key of the Shift, Alternate, and Control keys. Don't expect such a distinction except for certain computerwide, potentially destructive operations, such as shutting down the computer's processor. Also, there's no hardware-independent way to differentiate the left and right
