On-line / Credit card ordering - Is it safe at all?

We are using KAGI, the worlds oldest and biggest payment processing service together with thousands of fellow software developers worldwide. Credit cards are charged by KAGI and not by us! The online order page runs on a secure web server (SSL 128 bit encryption, located in California, United States) and uses the HTTPS protocol for encrypted data transfer. This means that everything, including your name, address, credit card number, expiration date, even the product identifier you have purchased will be encrypted into a completely unintelligible, meaningless data stream while travelling, so it can ONLY be decoded by the remote SSL server. To decipher a single order which was sent using this technique would require thousands of computers running networked for several years. In fact, you are taking a bigger risk when you are paying at a local store with your credit card, where they always keep a copy of the receipt of a transaction (with your card info on it) - not mentioning the case, when you just simply throw your own copy away.

Customers are understandably concerned that details regarding their personal contact and credit card information are protected. When KAGI receives and processes a payment from a customer, we receive an accounting of the transaction from KAGI. The information provided to us is complete enough to allow us to ship the product, but we do not have access to the banking or credit card details provided by a customer!
