Berekeley Breathed's favorite Outland strips from 1980 to 1995. As he himself says about his often bizarre sense of humor, "what seems funny to a sleep-deprived brain at 4:00 A.M. often reads as merely hallucinogenic when laid down on the sober newsprint of a newspaper comic page. This may explain my initial popularity on college campuses around the country."

From Dostoyevsky to Dali, if the history of humankind teaches us anything, it's that the most brilliant individuals of any era were often the most peculiar as well. In fact, they were positively weird.

Presented in a uniquely engaging illustrated format, the "alternative lifestyles" of 67 crackpots and visionaries have been graphically interpreted by an equal number of today's most popular comic artists.

The New York Times Book Review:

Sarah Bernhardt liked to play dead for photographers, arranging herself in a tasteful rosewood coffin. As an infant, William S. Burroughs saw tiny men romping among his alphabet blocks. The inventor Nikola Tesla feared women who wore pearl earrings and, like Howard Hughes, was so frightened of germs that he avoided shaking hands. The stories of these and 60 other eccentrics are set out by Carl A. Posey in The Big Book of Weirdoes and illustrated, in black and white, by 63 graphic artists.
