

on's Monthly Excursion from Normality

This month's theme: Humor in the Workplace

A great many of us work in offices, some by choice, but most because they fell into a bloody trap set by the colleges and guidance counselors of America. To overcome your rampaging desires to become the Unabomber's protégé, I turn you to your computers. Computers aren't for doing work, they're for finding jokes!

Humor Inc.

<http://www.humorinc.com/>

You know those stupid things employees pass around the virtual coffee pot (a.k.a. the Internet)? Well, you can find them here, then impress your friends and family!

Darwin Awards Official Home Page

<http://www.officialdarwinawards.com/>

I won't be bringing up last year's debate on evolution, but I am telling all of my loyal readers where they can find the official and infamous Darwin Awards. Mother nature is one funny lady, but her punchline is always the same.

The Funny Firm

<http://members.aol.com/funnyfirm/funny.htm>

Though this isn't the funniest of all sites, it does contain a tame selection of jokes. You'll probably find out that this is where many of your boss's best lines come from. If you're a corporate exec who needs a joke to start a speech, then this is the site for you.

Dilbert: Propaganda for New-Order Bolshevism

<http://www.andrew.cmu.edu/~dmb/dilbert.html>

This site may be the funniest of the four, but I can't really tell. This site is based on one individual's theory that the comic strip Dilbert is actually Communist propaganda infiltrating our lives. The owner even recounts the tale of being sued by United Media Syndicate, Inc.! Rock on, Marxbert!

What We've Learned Today

We've learned a few new jokes and that Dilbert is a stinking Communist.

Ron Freeman

ron@applewizards.net

<http://applewizards.net/>