

The document you just opened was created or modified by a Windows version of QuarkXPress. Due to an anomaly of QuarkXPress 3.2 for Macintosh, the document was not properly converted. Since this incorrect conversion affects parts of the document's internal structure important for FlowMaster, it is possible that FlowMaster does not work properly with this document.

Depending on the contents of the document, FlowMaster either has to be completely disabled for this document or is not able to locate automatic flow tables that might be stored in the document.

The only thing you can do about this problem is to open the document with FlowMaster running under QuarkXPress 3.3 or above.
